OLD WORLD

Old World wines refer to wines produced in regions with long-established winemaking traditions, primarily in Europe. These include countries like France, Italy, Germany and Portugal. The term is often associated with a focus on terroir—the unique environmental factors such as soil, climate, and geography that influence the wine’s character. Old World wines are typically more restrained, emphasizing balance, elegance, and a sense of place over bold, fruit-forward flavors. They also follow stricter regulations and traditional techniques, reflecting centuries of cultural heritage in winemaking.

NEW WORLD

New World wines are produced in regions outside the traditional European winemaking areas, including countries like the United States, Australia, New Zealand, Chile, Argentina, and South Africa. These wines are often characterized by a fruit-forward style, with bold flavors and higher alcohol levels due to warmer climates. New World winemakers typically embrace modern techniques and are less bound by traditional regulations, allowing for more experimentation and innovation. The focus is often on the winemaker's artistry rather than strict adherence to terroir, making these wines diverse and approachable.
